I. READING (10 Marks)

Read the passage carefully and answer the following questions.

1) Although most immigrants move to rich countries, a huge number of people move from very poor countries to other countries that are a little more prosperous than their homeland. The World Bank estimates that there are about 74 million of these immigrants. For example, many Dominicans come to the United States as immigrants. However, the Dominican Republic is also a host country for the people from Haiti. In Haiti, the average income is less than 20 percent of the average income in the Dominican Republic. In most cases, even immigrants with very little education can make much more money than they could make in their homeland.

2) Not all immigrants are poor or uneducated, however. The prosperous economies of many Middle Eastern and Southeast Asian countries have attracted a significant number of well-educated professionals, including doctors, bankers, and, most of all, teachers. In 2000, 36 percent of the 52 million immigrants in 20 host countries had some college education.

3) This widespread migration has a strong impact on individuals, families, and countries. This impact can be positive for both the host country and the immigrants’ homeland. Many countries have a shortage of workers. In these countries, immigrants can fill some of these jobs, especially jobs that do not require a specific skill. They can also allow skilled workers in the host country to be more productive. For example, in the United States, many immigrants provide child care, which allows parents to go to work. This helps the economy of the host country. Migration can also help the immigrants’ homeland because immigrant workers often send a part of their income back to their families in their home country.
